Police pulled into the intersection and blocked traffic to exam the gun, which turned out to be a destroyed flare gun. Police collected the flare gun to turn into property, and noticed a folder with a few papers in it also on the ground, along with all the other scattered papers that had been ran over by vehicles repeatedly. Police quickly examined the folder, which appeared to have a few important documents in it and stored it in the trunk of the vehicle. Since the intersection was completely blocked by the police car, police were trying to move fast. Police noticed one more mangled folder with some papers in it, lying in the road way. It had obviously been ran over multiple times only having one mangled cover with no back. Police picked it up and quickly flipped through it. It did not appear to have anything important in it, therefore, believing it was trash, police tossed it out of the road into the grass. Police then pulled out of the intersection into a nearby parking lot to better exam the property. Later police were called that someone had picked up the mangled half of a folder and various papers that had been repeatedly ran over. Police went and retrieved the papers and mangled half of a folder. The original folder collected by police contained multiple copies of a death certificate. The other papers and folder collected later by police contained an unactivated Lowes credit card which expired in 2011 and papers which appeared to be some documents of some sort. Most of the papers were badly damaged and had been run over multiple times by vehicles. The broken flare gun along with all the papers and folders were turned into the Chattanooga Property division.
